

Taking Advantage of Remote Interim Legal Opportunities

As law firms and in-house legal departments have adapted to keep business moving during a pandemic, there has been an increase in the range of remote roles. For attorneys interested in expanding their skills, remote interim assignments open the doors to unique opportunities and new horizons.

For one, you may be able to explore opportunities that are not available in your local market whether that is in a larger or smaller firm or in an organization headquartered in another region. For example, even if you reside in a small town, you may now find an opportunity to work for a prestigious name brand with offices elsewhere that offers challenging work remotely on a global scale.

Working remotely requires use of a broad range of technology—from video conferencing to digital databases to online document sharing tools. In an interim role, you will likely be exposed to different technology and software platforms in each role you take. This will allow you to develop new skills and learn new ways to work—which will add value in your future roles.

The same applies to industries. Working remotely means you are no longer limited to the industries of your local market. You may now have access and opportunity to work with Boston healthcare employers, Silicon Valley tech companies or even New York law firms.

If flexibility is important to you, then remote interim legal roles give you the freedom from the daily commute as well as the ability to better tend to your personal commitments. Of course, keep in mind if the role is in a different time zone, you should plan to be available to team members when it is most convenient for them.
